Course Learning Outcomes

Knowledge:

- IR Theory (Realism, Liberalism, Feminism, etc.).
- Levels of Analysis.
- Nationalism and globalization.
- International organizations, law, and justice.
- Secerity and conflict.

Application:

- Be able to identify complex problems in international relations.
- Be able to analyze the causal factors involved in those complex problems, analyze the possible current and future impacts of the problems themselves, and then identify possible solutions.
- Apply problem-solving skills to identify possible solutions to the complex problems of international relations.

Integration:

- Synthesize information and analytical methods and approaches from the disciplines of political science, economics, psychology, philosophy, geography, sociology, and anthropology.

- Describe how the analytical tools of all these disciplines are helpful for understanding the world political scene.
- Integrate concepts from related disciplines to analyze the world political scene.

Human Dimension:

- Students come to see themselves in a new light psychologically because of our focus on theoretical approaches to IR (e.g., realism v. liberalism). Students also come to see the moral choices they must make as they engage a world in which suffering and conflict are the normal state of affairs.

Caring - Civic Learning:

- Describe the influence humans have on each other through political and social interactions.
- Come to care more deeply about other citizens or about other humans in general.
- Also come to care more about the success of American foreign policy because they will come to appreciate the power of that policy and the stakes involved in its successful implementation.

Learning How to Learn:

- Develop greater efficacy as learners through class discussions, group projects, and written analyses of international relations.
- Discover that understanding and positively influencing the future world of politics will only be possible if they become capable of their own analysis.
- Learn how to create their own analytical efficacy in order to influence the global political order.
